Q. 2 Read the following passage carefully and complete the flow chart given below. Write the answers against the numbers.

Broadly speaking, there are three major forest zones that are separated according to their distance from the equator. These are: the tropical, temperate and boreal forests (taiga).

Tropical rain forests grow around the equator, in South America, Africa, and Southeast Asia. The temperature here is stable year-round, around 27°C. Most tropical forests receive at least 200 cm of rain in a year.

Temperate forests occur in North America, north-eastern Asia, and Europe. In general, the temperature here ranges from -30 to 30°C and the forests receive 75-150 cm of precipitation per year.

Boreal forests, also called taiga, are found between 50 and 60 degree of latitude in the sub-Arctic zone. This area contains Siberia, Scandinavia, Alaska, and Canada. Temperatures range from -40 to 20°C. Precipitation is usually delivered as snow because it is so cold, 40-100 cm each year.

	So, at this stage if the blind person has the support of his friends and family members around him, his problems are lessened. This is the time when he needs maximum understanding, help and encouragement.
	For a congenital blind person, acceptance of blindness does not arise as he has not seen the world at all. But those who have turned blind at a later stage have to face problems like demoralisation and dejection. Initially, it comes as a terrible shock to a person. His physical, mental, economic and emotional stress can be unbearable. The necessity to depend on family members and friends to do even the easiest tasks in life makes him feel more frustrated. Due to this he sometimes thinks of putting an end to his life.
	Sight is a gift from God due to which we are able to see the beautiful world around us can do our work efficiently and also move about freely. But can you imagine your life without this precious gift? Our life would have been doomed in darkness and frustration.
